The Independent, 01/02/2014, p.36, Unattributed	Letters to the editor	Later this year, the Health and Social Care Information Centre (HSCIC) will begin collecting this missing information. The HSCIC uses a combination of the NHS number, postcode, gender and date of birth to link a patient's details. Once a patient's record has been matched, these identifiers are removed and a reference number for the record is allocated instead.
guardian.co.uk (Web), 31/01/2014, Edward Hockings	Why we should opt out of the Government's new patient database	Overriding the common law of confidentiality and Article 8 of the Human Rights Act (2008), Section 251 makes it possible to access people's medical records without their consent. An equally significant development was the introduction of the Health & Social Care Act 2012, through which Patient-identifiable data can be made available, via the NHS Commissioning Board and the HSCIC. So we now have care.data, and the decision we face about whether or not to opt-out.

		The giant NHS database that could allow pharma firms to buy into patient records will now not be launched until the autumn, as NHS England admits it needs more time to convince the public of its merits. Due to start in April the system will now be delayed by around six months following a barrage of criticism that swept across both NHS England and prime minister David Cameron, who has personally backed the plans. The central database which will be called care, data, is to be built up via records from GP practices and links them with hospital records. The data will be managed by the Health and Social Care Information Centre
